

UNESCO in the NEWS

L'UNESCO dans les MEDIAS

It has been a quiet 24 hours in the media for UNESCO, with no big news stories concerning the Organization.

Jennifer Lopez's fashionable appearance at last weekend's UNESCO gala in Dusseldorf continues to feed the buzz of global celebrity and fashion press, including Elle magazine (France) and US Weekly, and also popular generalist web portals, including the Sina.com (China). While photos of J-Lo posing next to UNESCO's logo abound, discussions focus almost exclusively on her Lanvin dress.

Citing a UNESCO study on teacher training, La Nacion (Argentina) published an article revealing that only 20% of the country's teachers, especially those in middle school, have completed university studies. Clarin (Argentina) also quotes UNESCO statistics in an article on the literacy situation in Costa de Marín, where 50% of its 20 million inhabitants are illiterate, with women representing 60% of these illiterates.

"78.51% of Senegalese youth drop out of secondary school" is the title of a dispatch released by the Senegalese Press Agency, which shared findings from the latest GMR report.

Several Chinese media report on a December 7 concert that the Philharmonic Orchestra of Shenzhen will be performing in honor of the Director-General in Shenzhen. A UNESCO Creative City for Design, Shenzhen has chosen music as its preferred medium for "promoting UNESCO's Convention on the Protection and Promotion of the Diversity of Cultural Expressions ».

The upcoming UNESCO conference on combating Islamophobia in schools received coverage from Moheet (UAE) and the Kuwait News Agency.

The Corriere della Sera (Italy) published an article on the failed truce in Syria, and notes UNESCO's call for the protection of cultural heritage there.

Among the many articles published about World Heritage sites, a colorful feature story from the Mail on Sunday (UK) illustrates how Humberstone, a UNESCO World Heritage Site that is currently on the "In Danger" list, went from bustling "boomtown" to "ghost town" over the span of 35 years.
